A piece of blue paper—titled "Tomorrow's Bacon"—listing the names, addresses and phone numbers of the San Francisco chief of police and his staff was found at the Black Panthers Central Ave. headquarters, police testified Wednesday.

The occupants of the building were arrested after a four-hour gun battle with police Dec. 8 and have been charged with conspiracy to murder police officers. Their preliminary hearing is underway in Municipal Court.

Sgt. Raymond Callahan, who conducted a search of the premises, testified about finding the list and a large arsenal of weapons, including a Thompson submachine gun.

Dep. Dist. Atty. Stephen S. Trott asked that the list be considered "special evidence" and be sealed.

One of the defendants in the case, Elmer Pratt, who is reported to be head of the Los Angeles chapter of the party, said, "I don't know why. It's been distributed all over San Francisco."

However, Municipal Judge James Harvey Brown granted the motion that the document be sealed and that no copies be made.

In addition to the machine gun, 24 weapons were confiscated, Sgt. Callahan testified. They included 15 rifles, six handguns and three shotguns.

Callahan said most of the weapons were found in bunkers in the fortified headquarters and in what he described as a gun storage room.

Three molotov cocktails, a home-made pipe bomb, the ingredients for making more bombs and a World War II type "pineapple" grenade also were confiscated, he added.

A radio tuned to the frequency of the police unit directing the attack on the headquarters was found in the building, testimony revealed.
